CORRESPONDENCE.

BROOKLYN, N. Y. JUNE 24, 1890.
786 LAFAYETT AVE.

The great interest felt by the public in elevated sidewalks will doubtless materialize after a while in something substantial. To go over the big bridge and take a train to the place on Broadway where ladies wish to commence shopping, and then to promenade undisturbed and unaffrightened by lightning express wagons, or street cars endeavoring to make up time for a blockade or an accident, and to step into the second stories of our big shops, will be a wonderful saving of time and nerve force. It is now as much as one's life is worth to cross many of our city streets, and this state of things with the constant increase of population is every day growing worse. No woman should attempt to cross Broadway at the corner of Fulton street. I would not trust myself even in the hands of a two hundred pound, and height to match policeman. I saw a lady with a blue coated giant on either side of her the other morning in the middle of Broadway opposite the City Hall Park, and it seemed to me that they were all doomed to destruction. There was a runaway grocery wagon, a horse down, attached to a Broadway car, and a jam of vehicles and pedestrians that was enough to give one the hysterics for a month. I believe they all emerged alive, but the woman under special police patrol was a mass of mud and ravelings. Her lace skirt was torn into shreds, and her pretty poke hat with its wreath of blush roses was an utter and pitiful wreck. Somebody suggested an ambulance. With a wan smile and a twinkle of a very bright though mud stained pair of eyes, the victim of a crowded thoroughfare made answer that she would like an ambulance for her clothes as these were certainly incapacitated for travel, but barring a few bruises the rest of her was all right.

From all quarters comes the question: "What is the prettiest, most stylish, and most economical costume for country, mountain and sea shore?" Some amateur photographers who expect to be out of doors all Summer, several girls who are going canoeing, some who desire the daintiest fashions for archery and sketching dresses, have written me for advice. We all want something that is easily put on and taken off, that is light in weight, that is warm enough for a cool day, and cool enough for a warm day, something that can be brushed off and worn to dinner if one is late, or too tired to dress. In these days of swift evolution the world is asking for a great deal, and it did seem at first impossible to find a costume that could be recommended with certainty to meet all these demands. I have at last found these garments. They are called Ladies' Knitted Suits, and consist of a skirt, blouse, waist, toeque and sash, and are as stylish as they are light in weight. They are knit in every color, and while they insure perfect ventilation, they prevent a too sudden cooling of the body after exercise. There is a special suit for swimming and surf bathing which fills all the demands of picturesqueness and lightness. One of my friends has bought two suits for herself, and two apiece for each of her five girls. She intends to have them answer every purpose of comfort and dress in the Adirondacks this Summer. If one orders these suits by mail, it is only necessary in the cases of ladies to give their exact bust measure. In the cases of children, the age of wearer and length of skirt must be given.

In answer to the various questions that have been asked about the proper diet for delicate infants, and especially those who cannot be fed from the breast, I am happy to say that science has at last produced the component parts of mother's milk. This has been accomplished so perfectly that feeble babies from feeble mothers are far more healthfully nourished than would be possible in what we call the natural way. The name of this preparation is Lactopreparata—rather a formidable name, but the food is simplicity itself. This preparation is designed especially for children under eight months.

I have done everything but go down on my knees to the writers who send me manuscripts to examine, in my endeavors to have these packages reach me in a flat form, and not rolled. I can beg no longer, so I have decided to inform my clients that matter mailed or expressed to me rolled will not be read on any terms. This is one of the frictions that is utterly unendurable. Writers should use thin paper of commercial note size, and then fold twice unless the MS. is too bulky, and enclose in a large envelope. It is a foolish waste of money to pay postage for pasteboard covers, and to write on heavy paper.

The season at Coney Island is fairly opened, and everything betokens a successful summer. Brighton will probably be the most popular spot on the Island, because of the splendid stretch of beach that has "made in" during the last few months. There are no unsightly fences and bulkheads now to interfere with the enjoyment of visitors. There is plenty of soft sand and hard sand upon which the surf beats without constraint. Here mothers can sit and read with their little ones about them with their shovels and pails. Brighton Beach is now the lovely spot it used to be many years ago, and will doubtless be appreciated as never before.

HOT WEATHER FASHIONS

OLIVE HARPER DESCRIBES SOME VERY TAKING ONES.

Two Summer Gowns—An Innovation Illustrated and Described—All Who Wish to Be Comfortable and Look Well Should Dress in Cool Gowns.

[Special Correspondence.]

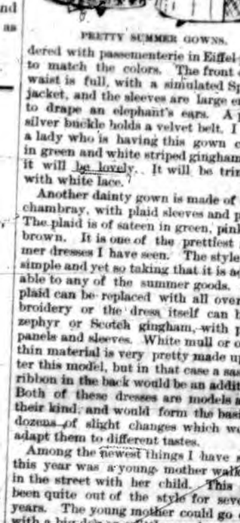
NEW YORK, June 12.—The "hot enough" weather is upon us, and happy are we if we are ready for it with the cool, pretty gowns that ought to be worn by all who regard their comfort or their good looks. I saw yesterday a dainty dress made of striped wash surah in myrtle green and tan color, and I captured a flash light picture of it which is here for all to see. The skirt is slightly draped over a self foundation, and bordered with passementerie in Eiffel points to match the colors. The front of the waist is full, with a simulated Spanish jacket, and the sleeves are large enough to drape an elephant's ears. A pretty silver buckle holds a velvet belt. I know a lady who is having this gown copied in green and white striped gingham, and it will be lovely. It will be trimmed with white lace.

PRETTY SUMMER GOWNS.

Another dainty gown is made of gray chambray, with plaid sleeves and panel. The plaid is of sateen in green, pink and brown. It is one of the prettiest summer dresses I have seen. The style is so simple and yet so taking that it is adaptable to any of the summer goods. The plaid can be replaced with all over embroidery or the dress itself can be of zephyr or Scotch gingham, with plain panels and sleeves. White mull or other thin material is very pretty made up after this model, but in that case a sash of ribbon in the back would be an addition. Both of these dresses are models after their kind, and would form the basis of dozens of slight changes which would adapt them to different tastes.

Among the newest things I have seen this year was a young mother walking in the street with her child. This has been quite out of the style for several years. The young mother could go out with a big dog or a little one hung on a string, or she could carry a cat if it so pleased her, and I believe it would have been regarded leniently if she had had a monkey perched on her shoulder, but her child with her, never! The nurse maid could take the children to the parks and there martyrize them all she liked, and fine clothes and pretty wagons were provided, but no self respecting lady of fashion could take her own little child along. But let us hope that the fashion in that respect is going to change.

The young mother in this instance wore a princesse dress of pearl gray silk warp Henrietta, made with a jacket of gray and black brocaded velvet. The hat had a brim of gray velvet and a soft crown of the same. In front was a bunch of pink flowers in a tuft of grasses. Of course the costume would not be complete without the eyeglasses. They lend distinction, while the veil affords a secure protection against mosquitoes and other obnoxious insects.



A STARTLING INNOVATION.

The little girl's dress was made out of what was left over from mamma's, and the jacket was of royal blue velvet. The hat was a "picture hat" of blue velvet, with a circle of ostrich plume around the crown. There was a sparse little band embroidered around the bottom, just above a tiny ruffle. The stockings were of blue to match the hat and jacket. This is a very pretty design for a little girl from six to twelve, and is susceptible to a number of changes. The rosettes on the skirt can be omitted.

A TENDERFOOT'S WELCOME.

Some of the Pleasures of Being a New Arrival.

[Special Correspondence.]

SAN FRANCISCO, June 7.—I had heard much said in praise of the social qualities of the unconventional west, and particularly of California, but I was not quite prepared for such a cordial greeting as I received upon my first day as a resident of Alameda. I rented a house on one of the handsome avenues of that rose embowered suburb, and an expressman piled my household effects in a promiscuous heap upon the floor. My time was completely taken up with the sordid cares of earning my daily bread, so I hired a man to settle my home for me. I did not dream of the disinterested attentions I would miss by unpacking by proxy.

When I returned home in the evening I found a bread basket filled with cards left by callers. The hired man said that oceans of sweetness had been wasted upon him by mistake. He had been mistaken for the new arrival. I called my homesick wife to my side and sought to comfort her by the show of welcome indicated by the card basket. I counted cards by the score, and in the expectation of a further deluge of visitors I brushed up my good clothes to receive in proper form. Only two more calls were made, however. One of these was from a gentleman who had a choice corner lot for sale on the sunny side of the street, and the other had a little bill to collect.

I spread the cards upon my table, intending to prepare a list of streets and get ready to return the calls. I found that to return my calls would be a costly and difficult task. There were in the lot nine—"only first class butchers"—who wished me godspeed and my trade.

Ten dealers in "choice family groceries" assured me that each name on the list was the most reliable caterer to the wants of the hungry man.

Three coal merchants each vouched for himself that he gave "full weight" on his wares.

Seven dairymen announced that they had a few prime Jersey cows which gave pure cream at ten cents a quart. An Italian desired to inform me that when it came to emptying swill-tubs and ash barrels he was an artist of the first magnitude. Price, thirty-five cents a month.

A Chinaman desired me to know that he could cover up more shirt with starch and blueing and make a shirt as uncomfortably stiff as any almond eyed son of a gun in the kingdom.

One card, more suggestive than all of the rest, informed me that the owner of the address attached would pay more for second hand furniture and carpets than any other man in the business. I thought it a little inopportune for one to make a bid on my personal effects.

I looked in vain for the card of a pawnbroker or an undertaker. But these were about the only branches of industry not represented. I presume these thought I would have occasion to seek them out in due time.

Hugh Farrar Macdermott's Youth.

NEW YORK, June 12.—It is hard to speak calmly, still harder to speak critically, of such a man as the late Hugh Farrar Macdermott. One who did not know him intimately would be entirely incapable of telling the world what manner of man he was whom we have just lost. Those who did know him are too incapacitated by reason of their sorrow from estimating him justly, or writing such a story of his life as should pass into history as the true record of the life of a true genius.

Such Macdermott was. The clear vision, and the blindness; the simple directness, and the erratic waywardness; the inspired utterance, and the child like petulance; the divine gifts, and the human shortcomings of genius were all his. While it may not be that he will be remembered as one of the greater members of the human family, it must come to pass that his memory will be cherished by those who knew him as the image of some fair, lovely child, whom the world could not spoil, whose very faults made him the dearer to his friends.

HUGH F. MACDERMOTT.

Hugh Farrar Macdermott was born in Ireland, near Enniskillen, on the 16th of August, 1834.

The father, Thomas Gould Macdermott, was a dealer in grain, and during the famine of 1846 and 1847 he was a heavy loser, finally becoming so seriously involved that he gathered up what means he had left and came to America with his family to make a new start in life. He purchased a homestead in Dorchester, Mass., and Hugh, then a boy of 15, was placed in Judge Brigham's office to study law. The elder Macdermott, however, died soon afterward, and the boy turned to the press for a living.

Macdermott's writing, immature as it was, was promising enough to attract the attention of Isaac W. Fry, then the managing editor of The Boston Courier, who determined to train him thoroughly, and put him at type setting.

Even at that early period Macdermott was a typical bohemian of the highest class, and affiliated readily, as he did all through his life, with the cleverest and wittiest of the writers of the day. It so came about that before the days of the famous New York Bohemian club of 1856 to '60 he was associated with "Artemus Ward," "Mrs. Partington" and "Miles O'Reilly" as contributor to The Carpet Bag.

It was in 1853 that he went to California. There, notwithstanding his youth, he became a figure and was an influential member of the famous vigilance committee. In 1857 he returned to New York and took up the stick for a living, but his pen was never idle. His poetry soon won recognition and for many years afterward his life was one series of successes. His best known poem is "My Blind Canary."

A Scrap of Paper Saves Her Life.

It was just an ordinary scrap of wrapping paper, but it saved her life. She was in the last stages of consumption, told by physicians that she was incurable and could live only a short time; she weighed less than seventy pounds. On a piece of wrapping paper she read of Dr. King's New Discovery, and got a sample bottle; it helped her, she bought a large bottle, it helped her more, bought another and grew better rapidly, continued its use and is now strong, healthy, rosy, plump, weighing 140 pounds.
